MSU hires new president to oversee Springfield, West Plains campuses

The first of three finalists to interview for the Missouri State president's job has emerged as the Board of Governors first, and unanimous, choice.

The university announced last week that Richard "Biff" Williams will succeed the retiring Clif Smart to become the institution's 12th leader.

This isn't Williams' first presidency. He held that title at Utah Tech University, formerly Dixie State University, for 10 years.

Board chair Lynn Parman touted the 25 years that Williams has spent in higher education in explaining why he beat out two finalists, including an internal candidate.

"He has served as a faculty member, as a dean, as a provost, and most recently as a president," Parman said.

Parman highlighted his experience recruiting and keeping students at a time when many institutions have seen numbers shrink and are bracing for bigger drops.

"Under Dr. Williams' leadership, Utah Tech increased enrollment by more than 40% and added over 200 academic programs," she said. "He guided the university through a name rebranding and a move to NCAA Division I athletics. What stood out most for the board is Dr. Williams' focus on the students - that very much came out in many ways during the interview process as well as the conversations we had with people about Dr. Williams - along with his proven success in strategic planning, community engagement, economic development, legislative advocacy and fundraising."

Williams called it a "tremendous honor" to be named to the leadership post. He starts July 1 and will have a base salary of $475,000.

He said he could feel the "excitement and the energy" when he was on the campus in mid-February.

"I've been in the Midwest 16 of my 25 years and I've been able to watch Missouri State University from afar and I just have tremendous respect and pride and inspiration from the rich history of this institution," he said. "And we're excited to be part of that future."

Williams had also been a finalist for the president of New Mexico State University. Asked the status of that, he said the interview process there just wrapped up.

"This is somewhere that both my wife and I felt very comfortable," Williams said. "We felt we fit in Springfield, we fit at Missouri State. The hospitality was tremendous. We knew that we wanted to be part of Missouri State University so we were willing to make this choice before other options presented themselves."

The MSU board met to discuss the finalists. The others were Roger Thompson, vice president for student services and enrollment management at the University of Oregon and MSU provost John Jasiniski, former president of Northwest Missouri State University.

Williams was asked how he felt about following Smart, who has been a popular leader and is deeply involved in the community.

"You build on the tremendous momentum and the leadership that he has put into place," Williams said. "I think that if I was focused on being beloved or doing the things that he did, I will fail. I just need to be myself and I believe that the board has hired me for some of the things that I can bring."

Williams plans to celebrate "where the university is currently at" but put his energy into figuring out - with a lot of input from the campus and community - about what comes next.

"Collectively, we're going to identify the direction that we need to go right now," he said. "We have a great strategic plan in place and we're going to fulfil those initiatives."

At Utah Tech, Williams said three former presidents still live in the community and he's encouraged that Smart will remain in Springfield.

"It's a strength," he said, "because they are your biggest champions."

In other posts, Williams has worked with the leadership that was in place and not looked to bring in his own team. Asked if he expects to be involved in any major personnel decisions in the coming months, Williams said that will depend on the board.

"I'm really going to allow the board and President Smart to include me as they see fit," he said.

Williams said he will communicate, collaborate and show consistency as he works with employees.

"The faculty and staff can expect to see somebody that is very visible, very active, very open to uniting our ideas and they'll see a tremendous advocate," he said.

Prior to Utah Tech, Williams was provost and vice president for academic affairs and founding dean of the College of Nursing, Health and Human Services at Indiana State University. He served as an associate dean of the College of Education at the University of Northern Iowa, where he was a faculty member; executive associate director of the School of Health, Physical Education and Leisure Services; and athletic training division chair.

Williams has a doctorate in curriculum and instruction from New Mexico State University, a master's degree in athletic training from Indiana State University and a bachelor's degree in lifestyle management from Weber State University.

Mental

the body: Their brain. Making upwards of a thousand decisions and thoughts in seconds. They are experiencing the emergency, with the caller, relaying lifesaving information to the caller and field responders. As the call continues, they are on constant alert for the safety of all involved. They do not have just one call or person they must monitor. At any given time, there could be multiple events happening and with each one there are numerous responsibilities. From the time they place the headset on for their shift their brain is on notice, on alert for the call. This is a prime example of mental exhaustion. They hear things that no one should hear and leave each shift mentally and physically tired.

Often there are statements made to a dispatcher by those who do not know any better, such as:

“Why are you so tired? You sit in a chair all day.”

“You’re tired? All you do is talk on the phone.”

“It must be nice to sit inside all day and just talk.”

These statements and more add to the mental workout. When heard, a dispatcher may replay some of the worst they heard that day, over in their mind, or it may trigger a call from years prior to replay. However, due to the confidentiality and respect to the callers, a dispatcher does not have the liberty to tell their family and friends many of the details of their day.

Call after call a dispatcher will answer and work to save life after life, hearing the most heart wrenching sounds. It takes a very special being to be able to hear this, put up a mental divide during the call and do what they do best. They may not have thought at the beginning of their career that their dream, when younger of being a superhero would come true, but I believe that each one that has the capability to sit under the headset and answer each call with a calm voice, has indeed reached superhero status.

Dispatchers are often not seen, but only heard when needed the most, then forgotten about once field responders arrive. Dispatch is involved in every emergency event, often well after the call has been disconnected. There are many that have and continue to support dispatch in various ways, believe me this does not go unnoticed and is appreciated more than you will ever know.

Next month, April 14-20 is National Public Safety Telecommunicators Week. The second week of April is designated to celebrate and highlight the unseen heroes with calm voices.

Please join me in honoring them during this time. The smallest of gratitude, even hearing a spoken “thank you” goes a long way to help brighten their day.

The Texas County Emergency Services office in Houston is funded by a 3/8-cent countywide sales tax approved by voters in 2013. Director Terra Culley can be reached by phone at 417-967-5309 or by email at terraculley911@hotmail.com.
